It makes sense to support them in cases when developer wants to use them. And then he just forgets to use them and then NullPointerException is thrown. So it make sense to add them into libs. And to support them in build.xml. It also could be solved with erasure. It works like this: package test; class Test { static function main () { var vc:VoidContext = null; nullFunction(); } function nullFunction() { vc.foo = 5; } } At the first time it works fine. But if I do "haxelib hlint" it will say that parameter is not nullable. A: Yeah, currently the process of adding in nulls is a manual one, and while not the worst way to do it, there are still some decisions that need to be made. One of the requirements of a nullable type is that the user of a function should always be responsible for checking that their argument is not null. That is the case for modules, but it's not the case for normal functions. So if you make a function that takes an optional parameter, and you check the parameter for null every time, it doesn't make any sense in a module. I suspect that is why the require statement is used instead: so you can always ensure that a value is not null. So it basically comes down to this: When using a module, check the argument.
