Two observers, A and B , are watching the experiment simultaneously. They are connected by a wire, through which they can transfer their information. A and B do not know what will be observed at the end of the experiment.

When the experiment is over, an asynchronization of the observers will occur. At this moment, B will be in an environment which is not identical to the environment at the time of the beginning of the experiment (and thus it will have a randomness). What is the maximum entropy that the environment of B could have at this moment? In other words, will the information held by B change if it is shown to A that he is in an environment different from the one he has in front of him at the beginning of the experiment? A: Let's assume the whole universe that we know about is at the micro-level, and let's say that the amount of entropy it contains is k bits. Then, as far as we know the microstate of that universe is a sequence of n microstates. When an observer B is "born", he observes a uniform distribution of microstates. When B learns that he's being "unborn", then he must join a global maximal entropy state of that universe and is being in it. If he tells A that his environment is different from the one he was in, he would have 0 bits of entropy. If he tells A that his environment is the same as the one he was in, then he doesn't have any information. The only way he could have 1 bit of entropy is if, say, he tells A that he knows something about the past, but the probability of that microstate occurring is the same as the other microstates. The environment of A is the same as the environment of B , so he knows nothing about B 's environment. The environment of B is the same as A 's.

So he knows
