Digital Image Workflows Today's digital landscape is continually evolving. In fact, the process of developing a new product or service begins with a series of "design" concepts that often involve the acquisition, capture, editing, manipulation, and delivery of various digital assets. This is known as the digital workflow —the progression of steps, activities, tasks, and/or workflow that exist between one digital asset and the next. In addition to having a workflow, sharing your work is also an important part of digital work. There are several ways to share a digital asset, including email, file sharing sites, social media, and more. As a designer, you will need to manage all of the digital assets involved in the digital workflow, to ensure that your assets are organized, properly named, and accessible. In this section, we will discuss a range of workflows common to the graphic design field. We will review how image editing programs often make use of these particular workflows. We will also discuss some best practices and methods of working that are particular to image editing.

ve helped make it through 24 hours of walking, but we're doing quite well on the Ben Nighthorse Trail, which is our longest route. Update on Ben Nighthorse Trail (Montezuma Creek, Colorado): We hiked the Pigeon Butte Trail at 10,711' today, and it was a gorgeous day at Montezuma Creek to say the least. The last 500' of the trail had been rock hopping for us, but after about 8 miles in I realized that the first 4 miles I'd had zero negative elevation gains, and the latter part of the hike was covered in 3/4 of a mile in total of 90' of climbing. So I had a nice bit of fast hiking on top of more of a hike, and this made all the difference. I'm not sure how many of you are conscious of the difference between total climbing time and total hiking time, but I think it's a big one. The way I tend to look at it is that 100 vertical feet of climbing takes the same amount of hiking time that a vertical mile of road takes. If you're looking at a mountain range that has a mile of peak to peak distance, then we are talking about nearly ten vertical miles on the summit, and I want to be able to say that I spent an equal amount of time hiking there as I did at the bottom. I hike; I walk; I run; sometimes I'm a fast hiker, sometimes I'm a fast runner. I'd like to look at all of it as hiking, because I'm not just "running" anywhere. I tend to look at distance in miles as a rough gauge of the hiking time, while vertical gain is a rough gauge of the climbing time. In the case of our hike today, we climbed 4,052' of elevation gain in 4.1 miles. This means that we've climbed 3,970' of elevation in the first 4 miles, and only 792' in the last 2 miles. Of that 792', 192' of that is climbing the rollercoaster rock hopping, which is 200' of vertical feet. As such, this hike from our last update to this update (it's been almost 3 hours for these updates, not 3.1 hours!) we've climbed 823' of elevation as compared to the first 4 miles,

If the desired color is not in the image itself, you can select a foreground color and a background color and press the Fill button.
