We're constantly thinking about how we can make it as easy as possible for people to explore media in new ways. We've just announced the new redesigned Browse page, which makes a lot of major changes to how people can find and discover a wide selection of media. A few weeks ago, we launched a new version of Cards to give people better ways to consume music. Today, we're announcing a completely redesigned Browse page for video and photos to give people even more ways to discover the content they care about. From today, those who log into Facebook will see a brand-new Browse page for video and photos. This will give users more context to see what is popular and what their friends are sharing, while also giving them a better way to find media. Starting today, you will also be able to use the new Cards feature to tell people what's going on with the people in your photos or videos. With a tap or mouse-over, you can get a quick glimpse at who's tagged in a photo or who's tagged in a video. You can also tap for more information and share your activity in that photo. For more, see our news post here. Photo and video clips from the mobile app will continue to populate the Browse page, while other media will appear in your News Feed. This means there are now three places you'll be able to

However, if you want to just do something like cat myfile.zip, unzip will create a temporary file and extract the contents and then delete the zip file, instead of just doing cat myfile.zip without the zipfile needing to be extracted first. Is it possible to use the `unzip` file name function on a zipfile without extracting it? A: The simplest approach would be to call `os.system(command)` to run the command directly, without using `zipfile`. However, the problem with `os.system` is that it may not work for other files with non-ascii filenames, or in the presence of signal handlers.
