A few days after H.R. McMaster became President Donald Trump's national security adviser, he made what seemed to be an audacious boast. "I can do this job for four years," McMaster said in the final weeks of the Obama administration. "For the first time in my adult life I get to wake up every day in a free country." The comment went viral, providing a striking illustration of the exuberance that accompanied Trump's victory last year. McMaster, who was a sharp-tongued critic of Russia during the Obama years, was a top contender for the job of national security adviser under Trump. He had been dismissed as a Cabinet member, but Trump liked him because McMaster had been on TV saying what he wanted to hear about Russia and its meddling in the 2016 election. Trump then made McMaster's job as national security adviser official — and here's the problem: It turns out that McMaster didn't really mean what he said in the final weeks of the Obama presidency. Now, McMaster is increasingly facing embarrassing questions about his actual approach to Russia and Syria, his credibility and his competence, as the administration grapples with its new foreign policy. McMaster, a retired lieutenant general, is entering a fourth year at the head of the National Security Council, a White House agency that oversees the foreign policy of the United States. As a force behind Trump's national security team, McMaster has reportedly tried to block Trump from appearing too hard on Russia and to persuade Trump to change his long-held opinions about Russia. He led the Obama administration's talks about whether to remove Russian Federation from a group of countries the United States considers state sponsors of terrorism, although in the end, the Obama administration did not remove Russia from the list. Trump, however, has been skeptical of the U.S. consensus on Russia since the early days of his presidency. Trump has also been more critical than Obama of Syrian President Bashar Assad, Russia and Iran. He has been especially strong-willed about standing up to Russia and has criticized its assistance to Assad. But despite Trump's rhetoric, there are growing signs that he now views Russia as a friend, and White House aides say they expect Trump to play nice with Russia this week when he meets Vladimir Putin for the first time since becoming president. The national security adviser is the principal operating hub of the foreign policy of the administration and often, at least in theory, assumes
