Have you always wanted to play a game on your iPhoneÂ . lead agency is the World Health Organization (WHO), which administers the global vaccine alliance GAVI. Sabin and other experts recently drew attention to the fact that the WHO has been issuing bulletins concerning minor new strains of measles for some time. The reason it no longer says 'wild type' measles is due to the recognised danger that the small new strain might have mutated to cause a worldwide spread of fatal measles. If that happens, the WHO will be hauled in front of the International Court of Justice over the constitutionality of the WHO's policy of only issuing vaccines for diseases which are highly dangerous. In May 2004, the same two WHO officials were in a controversial meeting hosted by a US government body at which they said they had the authority to issue warnings of such minor outbreaks (which they did not). Separately, they justified their decisions as being a need for adequate planning for worldwide vaccination against the disease. The WHO has been incorrectly listed as the relevant institution in the U.S. media as the "World Health Organization", even though it is in fact only one of six agencies officially designated as the WHO by statute. Measles vaccine controversy Measles is the least used vaccine by world governments, according to the WHO. Subsequent outbreaks of measles are evidence that the vaccine may not be protecting children

Download swift shader 3.0 full versionImage copyright Getty Images Image caption A widening scandal over bullying in the school system in Los Angeles has put the blame on parents US parents are being told to hold their children back a year so they can catch up in reading and maths. Upwards of 1.5 million students are in danger of falling behind their peers because they are not receiving the right education, say educators. It is the first time a government has set a benchmark for the reading level of pupils. State officials are focusing on test scores, as a way of addressing the problem of poor reading. 'Read-to-learn' Government data shows a child has a 50-50 chance of scoring a "proficient" reading level in reading by the third grade, but that drops to a seven-year delay if a child is behind by the time they start school. The No Child Left Behind Act requires states to compare students' test results with the state's own 2004 test results. L.A. school district

Los Angeles Unified in the state of California was found to have a "school-wide deficit" in reading for almost 4,000 students in 2009-2010. Image caption
