Epidermolysis bullosa (EB) is caused by non-homogenous ectodermal fragility of the skin. The term EB encompasses various subtypes, in which the clinical picture in regard to skin, mucous membranes, nails and eyes often differs considerably between patients and sometimes within the same patient. The pathogenesis of EB is still largely unknown. Although the clinical presentation in most EB patients is characteristic, other symptoms may sometimes be present, such as an increased susceptibility to infections, oral problems, dysphagia and pruritus. Because EB can be the cause of lethal outcomes, a correct diagnosis is essential. Special tests, such as double trans-epidermal electrical resistance (DTER), and molecular genetic
