keygenRetrospective analysis of suprascapular neuropathy in athletes with clinical and subclinical cases of adhesive capsulitis of the shoulder. The pathogenesis of pain in suprascapular neuropathy (SSN) remains controversial. The purpose of this study was to evaluate symptoms, signs, and pathology to clarify the pathogenesis of SSN in athletes. A total of 140 cases of shoulder pain that had been diagnosed as adhesive capsulitis were divided into a clinical group and a subclinical group based on the time point of onset of shoulder symptoms. We assessed the correlations among the following parameters: time since onset, SSN symptoms, supraspinatus strength and subscapularis strength, electromyographic test results, coracoid process tilting angle and scapular tilting angle, and intraarticular pathology. In total, 138 of the 140 athletes were classified into the clinical group. The clinical group had higher electromyographic test results in comparison to the subclinical group. Eighteen of the 138 cases in the clinical group were diagnosed with SSN by contrast magnetic resonance imaging. SSN was identified in 2 of the 18 cases. The coracoid process tilting angle was significantly lower in the subclinical group than in the clinical group. No significant differences were observed in the scapular tilting angle among the 3 groups. We conclude that the pathogenesis of SSN is primarily related to the development of adhesive capsulitis, rather than to coracohumeral ligament rupture.
