Table 2. Standard for calling a recommendation strong or weak. For more detailed information, see Discussion. We do not recommend or we do not suggest individualized decisions based on patient preferences. It is possible that your institution's coverage determination will differ from what is recommended in this document. We strongly recommend that your institution document its reason(s) for deviating from this document. A written explanation of your decision and rationale should be available to your patients and public. If you decide that your patient's benefit from P2Y12 inhibitor therapy is uncertain, a strategy that combines antiplatelet therapy with an anticoagulant agent is preferred. For more detailed information, see Treatment of Stable Coronary Artery Disease (Antiplatelet Therapy). If you decide that your patient's benefit from anticoagulant therapy outweighs the risk of bleeding, a strategy that combines antiplatelet therapy with an anticoagulant agent is preferred. See Treatment of Stable Coronary Artery Disease (Antiplatelet Therapy). If you decide that your patient's benefit from antiplatelet therapy outweighs the risk of bleeding, a strategy that combines an anticoagulant agent with a P2Y12 inhibitor is preferred. For more detailed information, see Treatment of Stable Coronary Artery Disease (Anticoagulant Therapy). Multivariable analyses showed that all variables that could be studied at baseline were independent predictors for postoperative mortality. Of the variables considered, age, Ccr in the preoperative period, the presence of a mechanical circulatory support device, aortic and mitral valve surgery and NYHA class of III-IV were associated with a higher risk of mortality at follow up. Aortic valve disease, mitral valve disease and preoperative AHF were the only variables associated with a higher risk of mortality after a hospitalization for AHF (Table 6 ).
