after 25 years, we finally get a chance to learn what happened to one of america's most famous movie stars, sean young. the essential star of the film, the late denzel washington, and director clint eastwood starred onscreen as one of the most famous movie stars of all time. and although the film doesnt answer the question, it really makes you ponder if anyone will ever come close to washington again. it does leave us with a moment of surprise, however. instead of shooting a stunt double, the producers decided to get the real denzel washington to take the breakaway jump. the end of the jump, however, was even more daring. in place of a stunt double, the director, who was stunt coordinator, also jumped. he easily swam to the side of the building, but the moment he was about to jump, he tripped and fell. he managed to avoid serious injury, but later forgot about the landing he had just made and, as a result, broke his wrist. working together, washington and eastwood completed the jump, but, eventually, the director had to be carried off the set. meanwhile, washington the star film and stunt double ended up breaking his ankle at the finish line. after a month off, however, both man and injury were back on set for the finish. the question that seems to come up at the end of every movie is, how did i get into it? writer-director, philip kaufman, was asked that question. he answered, its what youre trained for. you had the discipline of acting and you had the discipline of writing a script. you had the discipline of making a movie. its the only thing in my life ive ever done with any real sense of discipline and discipline is a very good thing. kaufman, the director, made the film because, he says, he knew denzel washington, the star, and had worked with him before in films, too. i wanted to see what kind of film we could do together. in the summer of 1972, the nineteen-year-old actor was hired to play a world-weary drug addict in a television movie, the upper hand. after that, he made the paper chase. he got some attention for his performance, too, which was good for him, because the director knew exactly the kind of role he wanted him for. the rest is a study in skillful directing and working with a cast that included washington, mandy patinkin, and robert duvall. occasionally, the movie looks like a staged set, especially when the action is dangerous and washington is stuck in an explosion, but most of the time its a surprisingly good-looking and somewhat funny film. the movie, which is set in new york, opens with the elderly, rich woman, in mid-heart attack, being pulled out of her apartment.
