Computer programmers that have an associate's degree need only four years to land a job, while a bachelor's degree takes six years. Programming jobs with higher salaries begin after earning a graduate degree, and demand for jobs in this field are expected to keep increasing. According to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, there were 1.3 million job openings for computer programmers and computer systems analysts in 2010. The median annual wage for computer programmers was $68,620 in May of that year. As of May of 2013, hourly wages for computer programmers were around $20.46. This represents a significant dip since May of 2010, which averaged $22.26 per hour. Programming is an excellent source of income, as long as you're good at it. One does not need to be a top 1% programmer to make the big bucks, but you need to be good enough to make your workload profitable. A survey of IT employees found that the best way to make $50,000 is by starting work at 4.7pm, and quitting at 5pm. Programmers' salary isn't just based on their programming skills, but also on their mathematical, logical, and analytical skills. It is also affected by the level of abstraction in their work, how deeply they work with the code, and the work that they do for their organization. Programmers spend one-third of their time writing code, one-third of their time developing the code, and one-third of their time troubleshooting and debugging the code. As a result, a programmer's day ends when the day ends. If you're a video game programmer, you are likely to earn much more than a programmer who works in other fields. For example, a programmer who works at Electronic Arts Games Studios in Los Angeles in 2008 earned $92,650 per year. On the other hand, a programmer who works at game development company Panic in San Francisco earned just $49,000 per year. Job sites that specialize in the games industry offer a list of salaries.
