okay, i'm giving it a shot on windows xp (ie9/ff12). i like and use chrome and couldn't be bothered with another browser, even if it was free. maybe it'll work fine for you. first, let me say i've been super-duper slow on the updates as a result of work deadlines. but i did go ahead and do a clean install after a couple of updates and that seemed to go well with the long delay in updates. i'm finding that this version of firefox has a lot of problems. i first see the dialogue to install the certificate i imported from my laptop, which worked in 3.6. but it tells me it hasn't installed the certificate automatically. i don't think that i will switch to an other platform because of a single cosmetic change. it seems to me that you like to follow the microsoft-way (which isn't great for users like me) as far as ui-changes are concerned. the privacy-mode is also a nice idea. however, it doesn't respect some people's national laws. for example, germany's telecommunication service is heavily regulated. when running in german, firefox downloads the german versions of components which cannot be changed. this is also because other european countries have similar regulations. your approach to a better ui is a nice improvement. the round tabs make firefox look cheap. is there any reason why they should be round instead of normal? they seem to make the ff a bit smaller. what if i want a bigger firefox? you haven't thought about that. and why a round image instead of a normal one? are the icons too big for the 10px round tabs? and why does the bookmarks-bar get smaller when you activate any of the tabs?

i use ff because it is more customizable while at the same time appearing more utilitarian than either chrome or ie. the problem with firefox is that it is too customizable while at the same time doesn't look as good as any of its competitors. every time i download a firefox, it looks different than the rest of my other browsers, its so bad i switch to chrome when i use firefox. i've tried to make firefox look good, i've tried opera, firefox looks better and from what i've heard firefox is for chrome users. firefox doesn't even look nice right now, i don't even use firefox normally because it's too much work. i went from xp to windows 7 to linux mint but i like firefox the best so i'm sticking with it. the only reason i switched to mint is because it has firefox 3.6 but i would have rather switched to chrome, even though it hasnt been updated in 3.6 years i still like the look of it better than firefox and it has the most add-ons. its all good browser. but im dont mean by that that you should suck the creativity to the bottom. i use that browser because it has the ability to customize and is fast. i hate all the with this australis thing. i dont want to download all kinds of useless add-ons and i certainly dont want a rounded icon theme. and the fonts sucked and did not look like they should. this is not happening with other browsers out there ok well the other issues all fall under the pretty much the same umbrella. ok so i find it quite annoying that if you download a plugin or a addon that hasnt been optimized for it you get a few seconds later an error that tells you the add-on is incompatible or crashed or something. have you ever tried to do this in chrome? how about opera? there are always going to be some addons that are just not going to work. unfortunately thats the way it is with computers and the internet. i personally think thats a flaw in the addon system. i mean who seriously thinks they are going to make every single add-on work on all websites. dont get me wrong, i love the addon system, but there is no reason to treat it like its some kind of treasure chest full of items. its a system and you need to deal with it as such. i really hate when i find an addon thats missing functionality just because its the way to go was to do that. 5ec8ef588b
