Concerning the flow control issue, it is strange that the desired situation for using gigabit ethernet is not being applied. The Dante network itself is up to 1 Gb ethernet, and even though the Windows NIC is class 10, it only acts like a 100 Mb ethernet ethernet NIC : the interface that is associated to the network card of the PC is emulated as an 100 Mb card and its bandwidth is not reachable from the OS. On the VM, I observed that a 100 Mb pci ethernet interface is used instead. The issue of latency is the real issue, and I am trying to investigate the cause of it (the source of the issue is probably the i386 virtualization of the gigabit ethernet interface). We got another weird issue : if the sound card of the sound VM, named dante_vst, has a headphone connected, the.Conv~ object dialog box claims that such a headphone is present on the chain, but when one of the headphone channels is selected, the.Conv~ object description changes to say that it cant find the object, something like here is a problem with the network traffic of the wire emulation... I suspect this is related to a problem I discovered with the DANTE objects themselves : you can change the rate of the stereo input sample rate (but not the rate of the 1.2 sample rate of the mono input object) or have an 16 bpp input, but the PC/host is 8 bit, so any object with a sample rate higher than the 8 bit rate will be considered wrong and rejected. This is not a problem when it is directly connected to the soundcard of the host machine, but it is an issue if they are connected to a host with ASIO, for example if they are bridged (if they are not bridged, the sample rate is correct). This is the reason why I first tried to optimize the Dante parameters (interrupt moderation, flow control, etc) and also tried to have a specific, modified VM. In both cases, the chain of audio objects was still rejected. 5ec8ef588b
