This question was asked as part of the interviewing process for a programming position. The context is that the method is part of a class that provides some functionality to the parent class. When a new method is called it calls the parent class method first, and then does a switch. The scenario is that a user enters an invalid input, and the method branches to the else case, which should basically just return an error string. The code looks like this:

class Parent { public String foo(String input) { if(input.equals("bar")) { return "My awesome string"; } f988f36e3a
