Transfusion-related iron overload is a well-established cause of morbidity and mortality in patients with thalassemia major. It has been demonstrated that chelation therapy can substantially decrease iron stores, but the prevention of iron loading is an even more attractive strategy. Iron chelation therapy requires repeated transfusions of red blood cells and repeated blood draws, with repeated hospital visits, and chelation regimens can be cumbersome and expensive. The iron-loading disease thalassemia major is the most common genetic disorder in Thailand, and approximately 10% of the population is affected. Recent studies have identified several genetic mutations associated with thalassemia in Thailand. The current molecular techniques permit early diagnosis of these mutations in carriers, and future treatment options for thalassemia patients will focus on cure as well as on prevention of iron accumulation.About the Author Ashley O.
