What's New in the?

This is a clean page we can load into MS Word to make a new document from it. Black Screen. Just wanted to let you know that I'm having the same problem as many others. Using 32-bit Outlook 2003 and have tried to update the problematic PPA. Anyone had luck at all? I've followed the directions on the Ubuntu website and the ppa manager told me that it's been updated....but of course it's stuck on "Not valid package format: The package cdrom does not exist in the archive" Hey, you're the man. Very, very, very, very special thanks for the really fast response, it's long past midnight here and I was just about to start ripping things out in my home directory with a pocketknife and take my own life when I saw the message. Likely there's a response from the people at Canonical, but in case I can't post, my problem was "I've updated my system and now the display is black with that strange little red ticker and no progress bar" The solution was: sudo apt-get remove xorg-driver-fglrx sudo apt-get remove libgl1-mesa-dri sudo apt-get install fglrx fglrx-updates fglrx-amdcccle The problem was that I was running an 8600M and thought it was best to upgrade that to the newest version. After removal of the old, the newest wasn't available. It looked like there was an issue with the PPA and updating it. I only upgraded because I wanted to use tiling windows managers. Had I not done that I would still be using the old version. If anyone can confirm whether there was a missing dependency in the PPA. I don't use it. Alternatively, some have suggested to remove packages in other ways and their packages should update. I did try that, and I can confirm that it doesn't happen. Perhaps there's a way to install the new package (which is presumably in the main Ubuntu repository) via some other method. I'm interested in any advice. The i915 driver is known to work pretty well. There's a walkthrough of it here: All three are listed in the guide, which might help you out. Apparently for your chipset, the open source driver only works with dual monitors, so dual monitor support with fglrx isn't an option for you. From the guide: "The open source driver only works with dual monitors but requires xrandr-2.0 to work properly with Xinerama and dual monitors. The Catalyst drivers support dual monitors but require the f
