If I wasn't planning to buy a new laptop next month, I would totally go for the Creative Cloud subscription right now. As someone who does a ton of design work for clients, I need to have a lot of access to design and editing programs. The latest version is pretty responsive, and, for a lot of people, it's the one that comes with their newer Mac. Although I have been using Adobe's Creative Cloud for several years now, I was really excited to give version 20.1 Pro a try. The latest edition of their subscription-based Pro version of Photoshop really feels like a beta of the latest version. The first thing you notice when you open Lightroom is the updated user interface. The visual changes include more details and thumbnails—and fewer items on the main workspace for your photos. Lightroom 5 opens with a view that allows you to see a series of photos before you actually open them. These photos can be organized into folders as well. Lightroom, like its massive brother photoshop, has an array of import options as well as new ways to quickly deliver your images to other platforms. You can organize your photos by date, keywords, rating, color mode, and so on.

The purpose of this feature is to eliminate the black or white colors in the image and fill them with color. You need to create a mask layer, work on the mask and then tell the software the colors which you want to fill. The software will fill them accordingly and blend the colors. If you don't like the outcome you can go back and change the mask layer to adjust the colors until you are satisfied with the result.
