Prison reform: The best and worst policies

The best and worst policies that could be put in place to improve the prison system in Canada. The Guardian has published an article entitled "The best and worst prison reforms" written by Chris A. Covert. He took an in depth look at some of the many proposals that have been put forward to try and reform the Canadian prison system. In my opinion, the "best" are policies that involve rehabilitation, education, and job creation for prisoners. The worst are ones that involve money and that aren't directed at the underlying reasons for crime. They are not directed at problem solving for society, and they do nothing to further prevent further crime. Prisons are a part of society and can have a positive influence on society. The more effective the prisons are, the less violence and crime in society will occur. For some people, imprisonment may be the only option, but if prisons are properly run and they do their job, incarceration should not be the only option. Here are some of the best and worst prison reforms put forward in the article.

1. Create 'Homes Without Walls' If it seems like you have a home everywhere but your own, this is called a "cocoon", and it's where people often go when they want to get away from the demands and responsibilities of society. The phenomenon of cocoons is well-documented in the book Cocoon by John A. Miller. You could also say that a correctional officer has a "cocoon" in his or her head. A correctional officer spends his or her life protecting society's interests within prisons, and that's really all that's asked of them. What if we could design a more humane way for people to be able to leave the cocoon? One solution being offered is "Homes without Walls". A safe space, close to home, where people could go to learn, grow and develop in ways that might help them deal with their problems and change their life for the better.
