MacLeod says he's not an original creator of the video and he has not seen the copyright infringement claims. The "The Sound of White Boys" on YouTube by two white creators. The accused creator is named "Kevin MacLeod" Posted by YouTube on Sunday, October 8, 2013 Uploading copyrighted content to YouTube can be a mistake, but copyright holders can't go after everyone who made the mistake. A film student named Alicia Choi, who had a video "The Sound of Black Girls," was recently faced with a lawsuit over the creation of a YouTube video "The Sound of White Boys." Created in 2011 by two white men called "ManuPierce" and "TheTruthExists," the video is a parody of "The Sound of Black Girls," a 1985 song by Parliament. It portrays a white girl's singing inspired by an African-American song. After South Korean legal firm Chosunuri created the video in 2011, they sued two white men who made it over claims that it was plagiarism. The two men made the video as a parody of Alicia Choi's. Choi had a video in 2011 called "The Sound of Black Girls" which parodied a Parliament song called "The Sound of Black Girls." The song is well-known for its subtle use of profanity in its lyrics. That song hit the Billboard Hot 100 Chart, but what made it famous was the use of the words "black girls." Choi's video is an homage to a song by Parliament. The two creators uploaded their version to YouTube When the video hit YouTube, it didn't take long for copyright issues to come up. The legal firm Chosunuri had filed a lawsuit on November 17, 2011 in South Korea against 2 men over allegations that their parody video was a copyright f988f36e3a
