None of the apps need to talk to one another, but they do all need to talk to the database. I test the apps separately, and if one app breaks any of the others in the chain, I'll run the rest of the chain on its own. When a problem surfaces, I can easily see where it's coming from and fix it. If that's not possible (e.g. because the other apps are on a different server), then I'll log in to the other servers and simulate the problem so that the other apps are affected as well. It's pretty much like unit testing except with a slightly different scope. ----- jmathai It varies heavily by the type of application. With a lot of applications that are more front-end driven, a quick set of
