Because the ocular hypertensive condition develops under normal physiologic conditions, understanding and quantification of the mechanisms leading to ocular hypertension will provide invaluable insight into their development. Observations from both clinical and experimental data suggest that the ocular hypertension is, in part, caused by the altered regulation of aqueous humor outflow. The regulation of aqueous humor outflow is controlled by the autonomic nervous system, which can be activated in response to a variety of physiological stimuli. Its activation in response to elevated intraocular pressure (IOP) provides the basis for a pathophysiological model of the ocular hypertensive condition. The neurochemical events known to be associated with the autonomic nervous system are described. The quantification of these phenomena under normal physiologic conditions and following the onset of ocular hypertension in humans is briefly reviewed.Benavides: A full-time student at Augustana, Roderick is a frosh on the girls soccer team.
