The broad, long-term objectives of this proposal are to understand the cell biology and physiology of intracranial arteries, the first line of blood supply to brain, and to develop better ways to predict, diagnose, and treat vascular diseases that affect cerebral blood flow. Arterial wall stiffness correlates with various vascular diseases and may be a marker of clinical risk. It is unclear how local mechanical forces (such as wall stress or circumferential stress) affect the compliance of the arterial wall, in turn regulating local blood pressure, vascular tone and blood flow. The overall hypothesis underlying this proposal is that arterial wall compliance varies according to local mechanical forces, which in turn regulate local blood flow and local brain function. A high, stiffened wall decreases arterial compliance but is associated with increased cerebral blood flow to meet the brain's metabolic demand, while a low, compliant wall increases arterial compliance and blood flow to the rest of the body. We will develop an animal model and develop novel experimental methods to measure arterial wall compliance. Then, we will test the overall hypothesis in three specific aims: 1) Investigate the dependence of arterial wall compliance on local circumferential wall stress 2) Investigate the effect of local circumferential stress on cerebral blood flow 3) Investigate the role of endothelial progenitor cells in the regulation of arterial wall compliance and 4) Explore the role of lymphatic and neural mechanisms in the regulation of arterial wall compliance. We will use our knowledge of arterial mechanics to explain the variations in compliance that occur among different layers of cerebral arteries with different geometrical parameters. Arterial wall stiffness is increasingly recognized as a marker of clinical risk for vascular disease. By testing a novel hypothesis regarding the role of local mechanical forces in arterial wall stiffness, the mechanisms regulating compliance can be studied. Improved knowledge of the cellular and molecular mechanisms underlying arterial wall stiffness, and strategies to improve blood flow to the brain, may help in prevention and treatment of vascular diseases.
