Photoshop is a global brand, with more than 1.5 million customers, including 600,000 photographers and designers, and more than 100,000 schools around the world. In fact, Photoshop is the best-selling photo editing app for the last nine years. The new Photoshop will also feature an animation toolset based on the updated Flame software toolset, and be natively GPU accelerated. Features of this future Photoshop will include three-dimensional modeling tools, and more. As Adobe continues to invest in creating the best 2D and 3D tools across its line of software, the new Photoshop will build on their existing strength. It is expected that this new Photoshop will be based largely on new, native GPU-based APIs, and will not be available for Windows 10 any longer. This is the most up-to-date Photoshop version currently available, running on Windows 7, 8, 8.1, and now Windows 10 since Photoshop updates can be installed on other versions of Windows as well. The new Photoshop will feature a modern UI with a focus on bringing color to design. The size and structure of the new Photoshop images will be optimized for use on all screen sizes. When the new Photoshop drops in Windows 10, the new core user experience will also be natively integrated into Windows 10's boot loader, making switching between application versions seamless. Photoshop's layer-based structure support use cases in multi-screen use cases more efficiently than single screen use cases (such as presentations). It is expected that the new Photoshop will continue to support use cases where designers use mixed media elements. However, the team is also making significant changes to make the new Photoshop a simple, expressive tool for designers with greater artistic freedom.
