In a color picture reproduced from a color film, it is well known to use a method of recording a color picture by a multichannel color camera, such as an electric still camera, for example, and reproducing the color picture from the color film with a color television camera. In this method, it is not possible to reproduce a color picture which is more natural than a color picture reproduced by a conventional color camera with a three-color filter. This is because the color picture reproduced by the multichannel color camera has a reddish and bluish color distribution caused by the characteristic of the color film, the characteristic of the light source for exposing the color film, and the sensitivity of the camera. To obtain a color picture which has a natural color distribution and is equal to the color picture reproduced by a color camera with a three-color filter, it is necessary to provide an optical filter for compensating for the color distribution of the color film to be used. However, this method is disadvantageous in that a complicated optical system is required.Work in Progress, Baby When I got pregnant with my first daughter, I was terrified of child-rearing. This photo of my daughter is from a
