Impact of host aging on susceptibility to intracerebral Trypanosoma cruzi infection in mice. The present study sought to verify whether an age-dependent variation in the susceptibility of murine hosts to Trypanosoma cruzi infection could be demonstrated and also to elucidate possible mechanisms underlying the age-related differences in the susceptibility. The results obtained show that mice over a 1-year-old age are more susceptible to the parasite than are younger animals. Also, the in vitro infection of cultured cells was shown to be more effective in 1-year-old than in younger mice, which is in accordance with the differences found in the parasite-host interactions in vivo. This age-related susceptibility was confirmed in mice that were immunosuppressed, confirming the involvement of host immunity in the host-parasite interaction and the detrimental role played by the parasite in the innate response of the host. The assessment of the degree of parasitism and inflammatory cell infiltration revealed higher levels in the brain of aged animals, suggesting that the level of parasitism is a crucial factor responsible for the increased number of inflammatory cells and/or the extent of tissue damage and the consequent enhanced lethality.
