Built into Adobe: After Effects is Adobe's own motion graphics application that aims to take our live creative workflows, bring it to life and deliver a final cut that we can show off and share. One of the biggest shifts from 2018 to 2019 is that Adobe has started to move everything over to the Native GPU platform. Products built on the Native GPU platform such as Adobe Camera Raw, Photoshop and After Effects are now being built using hardware accelerated pipelines. Services accessed externally to Photoshop, such as Adobe Stock, are also now powered by the Native GPU platform. The final new feature from Adobe's 2018 roadmap is the introduction of Live Edit for Motion. It positions Adobe Motion as the global standard for high-end broadcast tools. We see the introduction of live edit as a way of accelerating the process of capturing and exporting content for internal workflow. For everyone else, Adobe Motion will still be a global standard for broadcast content. Note, that all these features are also coming to the Windows platform, and starting with release 2018.3 there is a concerted effort by Adobe to make Photoshop even more accessible for the millions of users of Windows 10. More updates will follow. In our previous post in this series we discussed the developments in 2018 that we think have the greatest impact and effect on video editing in 2019. Now onto what we think the top 5 things to expect from 2019.
