There are more advanced tools to help you select aspects of an object in a single action, such as filling inside a selection or creating a smooth transition effect. Your prepared assets will be ready when you open the project or when you hit the Publish button. After merging in the other PSD, Photoshop will import those assets into the opened project. You can use the light-on-light background color as a global background when exporting, but you may still need to adjust the colors. Lightroom 5 can read and apply the same kind of color adjustment presets available in Photoshop. Lightroom can and will read the RGB values, known as Split Toning, and can make color adjustments to it. Exporting has undergone a brand new series of improvements. For example, the Export Settings dialog displays a preview window while you make some adjustments. This lets you see an image you've opened in Photoshop, with the most important settings. It also improves the export appearance when you choose the "Maintain Aspect Ratio" option. (For the previous version, if you did choose this option, no matter what the photo's aspect ratio was, you were stuck with that ratio coming out of the format you selected for Export.) If you have eps, you no longer have to use the RGB Editor before exporting. Instead, you can use the RGB Editor to make your adjustments, and delete the eps file and rename the file to match the one you exported earlier. (Lightroom 4 would often first export the file as JPG, then open with RGB Editor to make changes to the JPG image.) Once you Export the file, you can open the file in a JPG editor while still viewing the image in Lightroom, because it knows the format you're looking at has been updated.
