GAMES NINTENDO DR M&B Zynga STEAM/UBB DE MUND Copyright law Shareware vs. freeware Shareware is the name of a relationship in a contract between a software manufacturer and a user whereby the user is encouraged to use the software only as long as the manufacturer continues to provide the software free of charge. Free as in freedom Free as in license is a similar term, often used to distinguish between free software and open-source software. The distinction between the two terms is that the latter implies the software is licensed to users under a free distribution license, while free as in freedom implies that the program's author grants users the freedom to use, modify, and redistribute it, subject to the terms of that license. Free Software Foundation The Free Software Foundation (FSF) is a Boston-based nonprofit, non-governmental organization, that promotes the development of free software, i.e., software with the freedoms of the GNU General Public License, also known as the GNU General Public License (GPL). "Free Software" is a common term used to describe software for which there are no restrictions other than those voluntarily decided by the creator and their users. GNU General Public License The GNU General Public License (GNU GPL) is a free software license (or free software license) which grants free software licensees the freedom to copy, modify and redistribute such software under the terms of its license. In 1997, the FSF's license was adopted by a growing number of free software software developers and becomes the standard license for free software, which the FSF encourages to be compatible. GNU General Public License FAQ GNU General Public License FAQ is a widely used software license which sets the conditions of using copyrighted works. It is designed so that a publisher, who provides a work under the license to its recipients, can later give those recipients the source code for that work. GNU General Public License 0.1 2.2, 2001-06-30-FDL GNU General Public License 0.1 2.2, 2001-06-30-FDL GNU General Public License Version 4, December 2015, is a Free Software license for software. It is a free software license that allows free software to use, modify, and redistribute it.
