This is because each page is around two megabytes rather large. In order to get around this, I exported a subset of these images to a temporary location and imported them into Photoshop to create the final page. The images I imported into Photoshop were already prepared for publication. I usually refer to the ruler and move the image towards one of my edges or corners. This prevents annoying areas. After this, I would create a new layer and place my text in. I am all for a well-designed page that can be printed fairly cheaply, but, in this case, that didn't work for me. I would have needed to spend approximately three minutes to create every page, and that seems like too much. Therefore, I ended up using the quick layout template, which makes the page creation much faster. BEFORE: A static image.
