Various types of recording systems for recording data on an information recording medium, such as an optical disk, have been known. For example, a magneto-optical disk recording system which uses a magneto-optical effect, a phase change memory recording system which uses a phase change, and a heat mode recording system which uses the change of the crystal state of a layer of a magnetic material are known. JP-A-11-242554 proposes a recording system for recording digital information on an information recording medium which has multiple recording tracks, in which a light beam for recording is converged and applied to a recording medium, information to be recorded is recorded on the recording medium in a pattern of a series of light pulses, and a time of several tens of pulses is allocated as a result of a noise pulse is superposed upon a timing when the recording light beam is projected onto the recording medium, or a predetermined pattern of light pulses of a period shorter than the light beam duration is superposed upon the timing. In the case of such a recording system, information is recorded on a recording medium by light pulses, and an interval of the light pulses is a few tens of pulses to about one hundred pulses. Specifically, recording information at a high density and a recording density of 1 Terabit or higher, which is required for practical use in recording media of current size, is achieved by a superposing and printing a series of pulses on the order of a few tens of pulses. In this case, since the light beam does not irradiate a particular portion of the recording medium, generally, the energy density of the light beam is reduced and also, the beam diameter is increased. In this case, therefore, the probability of the beam irradiating on a track unrelated to a target track to be recorded is increased. As a result, the probability of recorded information belonging to the irrelevant track being read out is also increased, causing a problem that the probability of reproducing the information is reduced
