Recently it was suggested that mild apoptosis has a protective effect against infantile respiratory distress syndrome (IRDS). We hypothesize that apoptosis and necrosis has a role in the 'cascade hypothesis' in sudden unexplained death in infancy (SIDS). We studied, in our laboratory SIDS cases where extensive microscopic evaluation of brain tissue (brainstem and cerebellum) was available. Tissue from the lungs, heart and liver of these cases were also available. The "cascade hypothesis" consists of various somatic and neurological changes, which become prominent when tissues have undergone ischemia and hypoxia. In our material, histopathological changes, like somatic or histological findings, were not, or only very rarely, found. Extensive apoptosis or necrosis did not seem to be present in any of the cases examined. In some of these cases, however, changes in smooth muscle of aorta were found, which can be explained by small changes in the aorta. We conclude that the "cascade hypothesis" is not the explanation for SIDS in cases where extensive apoptosis or necrosis is not found in brain tissue.
