To establish an in vivo allograft model of human bladder interstitial cystitis (IC). Bladder biopsy tissues were obtained from one patient with IC, who underwent radical cystectomy and then was diagnosed as having BPH based on pathological assessment. After the surgical biopsy tissues were cultured in vitro, the epithelial cells were harvested and then transplanted subcutaneously into severe combined immune deficiency (SCID) mice to create a model of interstitial cystitis. The success rate of the model was determined by observing the presence of acute rejection with histology, and by in-vivo monitoring urodynamic parameters for those animals which develop human IC-like bladder dysfunction. The PAS-stained histological sections of the biopsy showed abnormal architecture of the bladder wall. Immunohistochemical staining of the sections with CK-pan-positive leukocytes, ICAM-1-positive urothelial cells, and ED1-positive mononuclear cells (MNCs) confirmed the rejection of human cells. The blood pressure of the mice increased significantly at 6 weeks after inoculation. The bladders of the mice showed edema and inflammation as early as 2 weeks after inoculation, and the mice started to have bladder inflammation at the end of the 4th week. The micturition frequency and amplitude decreased as the inflammation progressed, accompanied by bladder wall thickening. The histological examination of the bladder wall showed severe inflammation and hyperplasia in the detrusor muscle layer. A novel model of human IC has been established, which could be used to study the pathogenesis of this disease and serve as a useful model for evaluating the efficacy of new
